Into the Battle.

Into the battle the Trooper speeds, As the bugles call and the drums respond; Into the fight as the captain leads Where the low line waits on the hill beyond; Waits for the signal—then the crack Of blue steel rimmed with a crest of flame-And few ride back on the homeward track Where many rode when the order came.

Into the battle the Trooper speeds, Into the line where the rifle rings; But little the Trooper hears or heeds The song of hate that the shrapnel sings; The roar of battle-the curse-the shout-The crash and clamor of friend and foc-The riderless horse that wheels about And gallops past to the plains below.

For out from the smoke wreath, far away, He hears the patter of little feet-The dim, far call of a child at play, With babyhood laughter, low and sweet; The murmur of voices, dream swept far From the little path to the cottage gate, Where eagerly under the evening star Mother and child in the twilight wait.

Into the battle the Trooper speeds, But somewhere out from the Far-off Lands An echo drifts where a soft voice pleads, And the tender pressure of little hands; Where a slant of the moondrift spans the wall, And the June winds come with the rose's breath, Where out of the blur lost voices call Over the shrapnel's song of death.

Into the battle the Trooper speeds, But little the rider hears or heeds The song of hate that the shrapnel sings; The roar of battle-the curse-the shout-The crash and clamor of friend and foe-The riderless horse that wheels about And gallops past to the plains below.
